MARICOPA COUNTY RESIDENTS SAY POLITICIANS ARE RACE BAITING ON IMMIGRATION

Phoenix, Arizona, December 12, 2007 Two thirds of Maricopa County residents have no question that the immigration debate is a very serious issue, but they as well believe that some politicians have worked to turn it into "an ugly racial issue."

At the same time, the public is unwavering in its belief that US immigration laws need to be reformed in a way that will allow immigrant workers to come and go without breaking U.S. laws and that humane and fair treatment of foreign workers is important in our endeavors to secure the borders.

Two thirds also believe that it is wrong to characterize people illegally entering the US in pursuit of jobs as "common criminals". These views are highly consistent, indeed literally unchanged, with what was found in the summer of 2006 and as such reveal a public whose fundamental beliefs have remained unshaken by the vitriolic rhetoric of the debate of the past 18 months. They remain firmly of the belief that while our borders need to be secured, politicians should tone down the rhetoric that characterizes illegal immigrant workers as little better than common criminals.

The study also finds that by 52 to 39 percent, Maricopa County residents hold the view that the only long term solution to illegal immigration is for the economies of Mexico and Central America to strengthen - if necessary through U.S. economic help.

Finally, views are divided as to whether the United States must look to immigration as a means to fulfill its future labor needs. Yet the study finds that a plurality of 44 percent already hold that view that the role and importance of immigrant labor must be taken more seriously. Some economists argue that because more Americans are exiting the labor force than are being replaced by young Americans, immigration laws must be reformed to take up slack in the supply. Otherwise, America will continue to lose ground in the world economy.
